A very interesting question was established, Colombian companies are looking for professionals outside the country to compete in the market, but should not they be growing with the professionals of their country, making Colombia grow?

According to the talk, the big problem lies in how the professionals in training, are not allowed to practice from very early in their training, this is essential, since the true form of development, learning, order is learned at the time of Have a job and know that what you do goes beyond that.

for this reason, during the talk, I strongly recommend those people who want to have their own company, their own software, but first work, learn how these great companies carry out these businesses, how they develop a structure, some guidelines to follow, and Let's learn every detail we can of that valuable experience.

He also added that we can't stop, that if we really want to learn to develop software, we must advance at all times to grow, and learn from the world, always looking for offers, and specializations beyond.

He told us that he would like companies to help make this vision a reality, to have true professionals trained as they should be, allowing students to learn how a software development company works very early, and thereby take that first step to really learn to develop quality software.
